Christmas Consciousness

Steven E. Kaufman*

ABSTRACT

Christmas is not ultimately a celebration of the physical birth of a certain person. That is just the excuse that Consciousness uses to throw a party celebrating the Awakening of Itself to the Christ-Consciousness, to the unity and oneness of Itself that lies hidden and obscured behind all appearances. Peace on Earth, good will toward men. Not just an empty slogan, but what naturally arises within any Consciousness that sees past the appearance of "I am this" and "you are that," and into the underlying Isness, and so into the underlying Oneness, and so into the singular "I am" that lies beyond the appearance of two things where there is only ever actually one Nothing.

Key Words: Christmas, Consciousness, Christ, Oneness, nothing, awakening, appearance.

There is not God and the world, there is only God.

There is not Nothing and something, there is only Nothing.

That there is God and the world, Nothing and something, is an illusion.

The illusion that there is both God and the world, both Nothing and something, is like the illusion that arises where there is only a mirror but there appears to be both a mirror and a reflection, and so the appearance of two where there is only one.

The world of somethings is a reflection that arises within the mirror that is God, within the mirror that is Nothing, within the mirror that is Consciousness.

The world of somethings exists like a reflection exists, but the world of somethings, like a reflection, is not what is actually there where it only ever appears to be.

What exists is created, whereas what is actually there is not created but simply Is.

What is actually there where the world of somethings appears to be is the formless Isness we call our Consciousness.

And it is within that Nothingness, within that formless Isness, that the world of somethings arises and exists.

And it is by that Nothingness, by that formless Isness,
is known as reality.

And so there is always the appearance of two things;
the reflection and the mirror,
the world and God,
something and Nothing,
reality and Consciousness, when all there actually Is is the one thing that is not a thing, because the other thing that is a thing; the world, the somethings, the reality, is not actually an Isness, but is only a reflection, and so is only an appearance, and so is only an existence, that arises within the Isness, that arises within the Nothing, that we call Consciousness.

The appearance of what exists is not itself an illusion.
It is the appearance of what exists as what is actually there where it only appears to be that is the illusion.
And so it is only the appearance of what exists as what is that is the illusion.

Caught up in this illusion, convinced of the ultimate reality of reality, the Isness of which the world is actually composed becomes hidden behind what only exists masquerading as what is.

And this illusion,
whereby what only exists appears as what is,
imparts upon reality, imparts upon what only exists, a false status of equivalence between created reality and uncreated Isness.

And it is this false equivalence between existence and Isness that allows the uncreated Isness to mistake itself for what only exists, and so mistake itself for its own creation.

And once the Isness knows itself as what only exists, then when the Isness somehow notices Itself, somehow notices the Isness, that Isness must then seem to Itself to be other than itself.

The word God is just what we call our Self when that Self becomes somewhat aware of the Isness, and so becomes somewhat aware of Itself, while still unable to recognize Itself.

And so arises
the idea of a God that is other than our self and other than the world.

that is separate from our self and separate from the world.

And when God and the world seem to be two different things, we approach the world differently than we approach God, not knowing that to approach the world is to actually approach God cloaked in a veil of form, covered in what is only an appearance.

Divinity does not just lie within, but lies equally without, it just has to be found within before it can be found without.

Once divinity has been found within, where as the formless Isness it wears no mask, it can then be found without as the formless Isness that lies behind every mask, behind every appearance, behind every reflection that we call the world, that we call something, that we call reality.

Christmas is not ultimately a celebration of the physical birth of a certain person.
That is just the excuse that Consciousness uses to throw a party celebrating the Awakening of Itself to the Christ-Consciousness, to the unity and oneness of Itself, that lies hidden and obscured behind all appearances.

And this celebration is an invitation to all to become more aware of the Oneness that lies somewhat hidden behind the appearance
of me and the others,
and of us and them,
and which lies completely obscured
behind the appearance
of me versus the others, and of us versus them.

Peace on Earth,
good will toward men.
Not just an empty slogan, but what naturally arises within any Consciousness that sees past the appearance of "I am this" and "you are that,"
and into the underlying Isness, and so into the underlying Oneness, and so into the singular "I am" that lies beyond the appearance
where there is only ever actually one Nothing.
